Greetings from Hindustan International School, Padur!

February has been a month of dedication, reflection, and new beginnings at Hindustan International School, Padur. With revision sessions in full swing and Board exams approaching, our students are focused on their academic goals, supported by their teachers. ### THE WARMTH OF FOOD

Mara came home late, worn out from the day. She dropped her bag by the door and didn't bother turning on all the lights—just the kitchen one. That glow was enough. The fridge hummed when she opened it, and she noticed the sound. Inside sat leftover pizza, a couple of eggs, and a lemon she'd bought for no real reason—cheap, bright, maybe both. She stood there too long with the door open, the pale light shining on her face like it was waiting for her to decide something. She thought about texting someone, but it was already too late. She pulled out a pan, tossed in way too much butter, and cracked the eggs too hard. Shell pieces fell in, and she fished them out with her fingers, sighing. Then she squeezed the lemon like she was mad at it. The sharp smell filled the kitchen, waking her up. She smiled at the result—the golden eggs wrapping around the pizza, like a strange but perfect color palette.

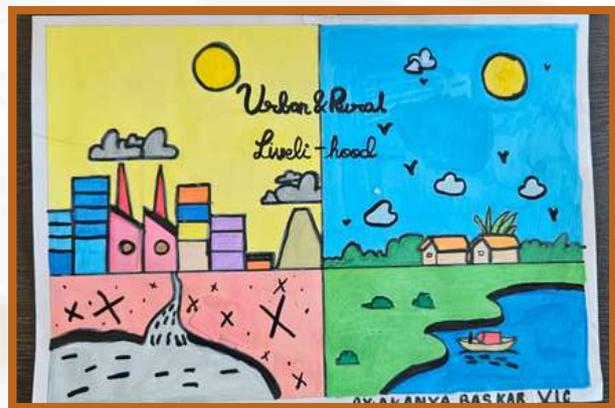

At first she ate standing up, but then she grabbed a plate. She laughed to herself, thinking, why can't I plate the food like MasterChef? Digging back into the fridge, she found peas and broccoli. Her eyes widened as she arranged them, surprised at how good it looked. The food tasted better than she expected—warm, simple, exactly what she needed. She realized she was hungrier than she thought. Nothing dramatic happened, and that was the point. Later, the plate sat in the sink, unwashed. The kitchen smelled of butter and lemon, sharp but comforting in its own way. It wasn't relief, but it made her feel present, like she hadn't disappeared. She turned off the light, leaving only the glow from outside. The fridge kept humming. Mara breathed in the smell one last time, then finally went to bed.
